

The program of "Lifelong learning in the field of sustainable development and environmental protection" responds to the findings obtained from the identification of the needs of adult education in the partner countries.

Sustainable development - a challenge for European education systems

We realize that until now the development has been unregulated. It takes place in an environment of limited resources and is unsustainable. We see this as reducing the quality of the environments – both natural and social. The proposed solutions should not only reduce this development but they should also help replace it by its sustainable form.

Education has become an effective instrument for implementing the concept of sustainable development. Both formal and informal education systems inadequately incorporate themes of environmental sustainability and care of public space in their educational programs. The Llabs project addresses these issues in adult education.

It also promotes cooperation among organizations, as experience exchange allows exceeding the current standard of addressing the issue as well as it offers the opportunity of considering the topic in a broader European context.

This project is innovative and it is focusing on mapping the educational practices in formal and non-formal education and provides examples of best practice examples of applying innovative and creative practice courses and trainings focused on the area of sustainable development from which the partner organizations in partner countries benefit.
